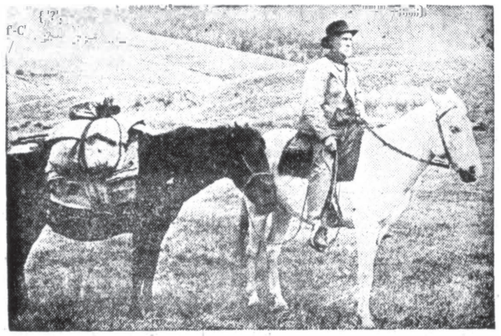
Barney Hughes - Alder Gold



BARNEY HUGHES
Montana pioneer who probably prospected in this state longer than any one man in the early days.

Barney Hughes was a quiet, un-aggressive son of Ireland, and sailed to New York at the age of twelve. He then moved to California at the age of 27 in 1858. In the spring of 1862, he made his way to Idaho and joined up with a small group of miners traveling towards placer work in what later would be called Gibbonsville. It was reputed to be the oldest mining camp in Idaho. One can vision this little man among a band of travelers making his way up through the Bitterroot, which at that time was a series of rocky flats surrounded by pine trees and underbrush along the rivers and streams. The party went up through Ross' Hole, following an old Indian trail. In August of 1862, an excited gold miner carried the news of a rich strike in Bannack to the Idaho prospectors. Barney was among those who packed up their few belongings, climbed the steep trail up the Nez Perce creek, over the continental divide; waded through the tall thick grasses of the Big Hole and Grasshopper and into Bannack. Bannack was too crowded for Bar-ney, so he made a new plan with fellow prospectors Bill Fairweather, Henry Edgar, Tom Cover, Bill Sweeney, and Henry Rodgers. The six packed their horses and headed toward the Yellow-stone River where they had planned to meet up with James Stewart and another party of min-ers from Fort Benton. Just as they started their trip, they were surrounded and taken prison-ers by a band of Crow Indians. Most of their clothes, food and supplies were taken, were at the mercy of the Crow Indians. Here they were held captive for a few days while the Crow tribe held long councils, trying to agree as to their disposal. Finally, a decision to release them so they were allowed to leave with some bone-weary horses, a few pounds of flour, a little bacon and coffee and their guns. That night they camped not far from the Indian village. After dark, one of the Crow women snuck into their camp to warn them, that they had been let go just for the sport and they better just move on. The weeks that followed were one long game of hide and seek. The miners were heading back towards Bannack, but with only a vague idea of where they were. On May 23rd they camped on what was to be Alder Gulch, very near where Virginia City now stands. They had a frying pan that served the triple purpose of a mixing bowl, gold pan and cooking utensil. This is where they panned their first dirt of thirty-five cents. (Or five dollars depending on who tells the story) They then decided to prospect up and down the gulch to see how far the pay dirt extended and then stake their claim. Barney would later say that after he left his claim at Alder Gulch, he buried $24,000 in gold dust on the bank of the Beaverhead River a few miles below what Dillon would later be, and went to British Columbia, carrying about $12,000 with him in a flour sack. While in British Columbia he met and befriended George Ives. Barney is quoted as saying, "I became well acquainted with him and though him one of the finest people I ever met. He was honest, and industrious as any man in the west." He then returned a few months later, dug up his gold on the banks of the Beaverhead and went to San Francisco. He said he paid a lawyer named
Hogan of the Hibernian Bank $175 to invest all his money into real estate. About a decade later he made a rich discovery on Hughes creek in Idaho. There are two streams flowing from the divide, one flows to the Bitterroot, and one flows into the Salmon Valley on into Idaho. These waters bear his name as a sort of monument to his second discovery. The time of Barney Hughes arrival in the Big Hole is not exactly known. He partnered up with Lucian Eby and did they some mining on the old road between Wisdom and Gibbonsville. In 1887 he built a cabin once owned by Ben Van Houten which would have been located up by Van Houten Lake. J.P. Lossi, a pioneer merchant of Wisdom told tales of trading gold with Barney. "Barney was a good old guy, never a word with any-one, or about anyone; and as honest as the day is long. I liked to talk with him when I was a kid. He was clean and intelligent. He was a grand old guy." Barney was welcome at every ranch house all over the country, and in his later years, in the Big Hole. The last years of his life Barney spent most of his time with Fred Else who lived in the Givens District of the battleground. He called Mr. Else's cabin his home. Barney was sure there was a rich deposit of gold in the Big Hole and that some-day he would find it. About the middle of October in 1909 Fred and Barney planned a trip to Wisdom to pick up much-needed supplies. In those days, a trip to town was on horseback or by wagon and a trip to town ment all day or a couple of days. So, they went knowing they were going to stay a night in Wisdom in a room over the Basin Mercantile Store. Sadly, at the age of eighty-two, Barney passed away in his sleep above that little store. Now there is a little headstone at the Wisdom cemetery that was placed there by the society of Montana Pioneers in 1912. It bears the words:
Barney Hughes, was born in Ireland 1827, and died Oct 27, 1909. Down at the bottom scarcely visible are the words: One of the Discoverers of the Gold in Alder Gulch. Barney Hughes was a quiet prospector that sadly lost all his gold, traveled from Ireland to America and British Columbia and back all around the United States. He lived a full and rich life.
